*The feminist principle of writing autobiographically, even if it hurts, redoubled the bet in this film. The “I” becomes a “We” and the We becomes a tempered I which travels the territory with the cadence of uncertainty. Due to Alice Diop’s curiosity about the human condition and her thoughtful language (or: the thoughtfulness in the language), the jury unanimously decided to give her the Berlinale Documentary Award for her film Nous.*

We were impressed and moved by the intelligence of this film, which effortlessly extends a psychogeographic tour of one city’s periphery through embodied observational scenes that touch on multiple social crises, historical context stretching back centuries, and an intimate personal approach that reconstitutes an alternative sense of collectivity. The film’s critique of this national multicultural project is handled with nuance, playfulness, and a sharp attention to race, religion, class, and immigration status. Its essayistic structure delivered a constant sense of discovery and engendered in us a state of deep listening. The Best International Feature Film goes to Alice Diop's WE.
